Dreamstime.com Anyone who spends much time in politics is aware of the corporate-funded climate-change denial machine and its powerful allies in the U.S. government. Many have discussed the problem. What is less well known is that the new House Majority Leader, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), is a major corporate-funded climate-change denier.
Pelosi's avoidance of the issue is concerning for two reasons. First, the nation's problems are real, and addressing them requires real solutions. Secondly, allowing Congress to defer facing these problems will only lead to more problems. First, the nation's problems are real. The midterm elections resulted in a new Congress with the lowest level of trust in government in half a century. The people sent a message to Washington by re-electing the Democrats to the House of Representatives and delivering a resounding defeat to the Republicans. The Republican Party, which benefited greatly from the ongoing consolidation of the wealthy into fewer and larger corporate-financed interests, received an even worse defeat than in the 2014 midterms. The 2016 elections put Washington firmly in the hands of the Democratic Party, a party that, since the beginning of the 21st century, has been successfully captive to the corporate-funded deniers of climate change. Since the passage of the U.S. Global Warming and International Climate Change Policies Act in 1990, a number of real or perceived corporate-funded deniers of climate change have occupied the seats of Congressional representatives from the Democratic Party, including Rep. Pelosi. The retirement of Rep. James Oberstar, a Minnesota Democrat, is an example of a member of Pelosi's generation of Democratic leaders. Oberstar served in Congress for 48 years. He was the ranking member on the House Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure. In that position, he has been highly influential in shaping America's transportation policy since the committee was
