I've said this many times over the years, but I'm finally sure of it. As soon as a person has really deep emotions in them, they will begin to cry. Why does this happen? Many people have asked me this question, and I usually just shrug my shoulders and say "I don't know." When I think about it, I believe it has to do with the body and heart becoming very dense because of the emotional energy being present in the body. But that's not entirely true. As I said above, I think that it has to do with the body and heart becoming very dense because of the emotional energy being present in the body. Because of this, there is an overload of that energy being stored in the body, and it becomes a very physical sensation. People are now realizing that emotions are not just in the head. We all know this to be true. But we can't stop there. Emotions are in the heart, the stomach, the arms, the legs, and in the mind. We hold them in our chest, our stomach, and all throughout our body. The way we are now, we're holding and storing the energy of the emotions that we feel inside our bodies. It's like we're holding our emotional energy on a frequency level, inside our bodies, instead of in the heart, the stomach, and the mind. This is why we cry so much. We're holding onto all of this stuff, and now it's a physical sensation, and we're not even aware of it. Even though we're holding onto these emotions in our bodies, we still believe that these emotions don't exist. If someone is feeling anger, we don't believe that they're angry. If someone is feeling sadness, we don't believe that they're sad. We just say that they're "upset" or "angry," but this is not the case. It's an energy thing, and it's just a physical sensation. You can actually feel this energy
